Already heading to madison

If its anywhere near what it looks like - I have to be prepared for tomorrow as Bob will go nuclear
If it was just june miss that's one thing but this will be a big issue across the org

Not sure. Trying to get with corry to understand his model's data.

I am tied up till almost lunch, but will find you to talk for 5 minutes.

Noit sure you cancelling trip makes sense because we need mfg data cleaned up.

Do still think this is a $20MM plus issue (using $2 0MM versus $50+MM to make me feel better ...) ?

Ron - happy to cover in more detail, but short answer is that all negative cost impacts are starting to hit pl as we have discussed.

Will be sending more detailsn but feel it is important to give heads up as we identify items

Steve,

This translates into about a 50 percent margin for the miss - almost twice higher than what we have been averaging. I did not even know we had 50 percent margin products. We really need to understand the mix story.

Subject: June Forecast

Bob – got a view late yesterday on June forecast (that was based on last week financial information) that had us rolling up $6.2 million short on net sales. With this sales number we look to be about $3.1 million short on the EBITDA side. That would bring us in at about $8.1 million v. $11.2 million of EBITDA. As we had previously discussed this would basically give back all the advantage we built up ytd and leave us an estimated $0.5 million short for YTD June on EBITDA. Everyone has been reminded to defer/reduce opex spend and factories are attempting to gain some production back while sales is working the inventory list.

We are also working on the rest of year forecast for which I will get an update to you sometime Wednesday. Initial indications are that we have production constraint issues and are working with Corry to understand the magnitude of these while looking at the opportunities to increase sales in areas where production capacity is not constrained.

Regards

steve
